The Sydney Morning Herald.

SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1890.

Last week the Metropolitan Water and Sewerage Bill was read a second time in the Legislative Assembly, passed through committee, reported, and set down for the third reading at a single sitting. It consists of three hundred and fifty clauses, and four schedules.

and it affects one-third of the population the colony in some of their most material interests. That a measure of such vast importance should pass with so little discussion is not, proverbially, laudacious. Parliament could be delicate, but not for the fact that it is delicate. It is not for the fact that a bill dealing with the same matters has brought in by Mr. FITZPATRICK, when he was Colonial Secretary, and read a second time on the 7th of November, 1878, without opposition. But the Government of that day left the bill still on the business paper when they went out of office, and there it remained at the close of last session. The present measure differs from that in several important provisions, while retaining many others. The constitution of the Board of management is radically different. Under the former the Secretary for Public Works was to be ex officio President, and another Minister and three other members were to be appointed by the Governor in Council. Under the latter the Board consists of seven members, of whom the President and two

Under the hand and seal of the Governor, and these three are to be designated "official members." The Municipal Council of Sydney is to elect two "city members" and the mayors and aldermen of boroughs and municipal districts to elect wholly or in part within the county of Cumberland are to elect two "suburban members." The President is to be paid a salary, presumably a high one, suitable to the heavy responsibilities of his office; and the other members are to be paid by fees for each meeting of the Board, but not to exceed $50 each per annum. The elected members are not to be disqualified for seat in Parliament, notwithstanding the 24th section of the Constitution Act. In point with a law and fact that section would not disqualify them, because they will be in no sense representatives of the Crown. They can neither be appointed nor removed by the Government, and they will not be the will of the ratepayers as expressed by the Municipal Councils, and they will not sit in office for four years. This is a far better constitution for a town than the proposal to place two ministers upon it who might be outvoted by their subordinates, if those subordinated had any scope for independence.

The powers entrusted to the Board are very great and comprehensive. The management of the whole sewerage and water supply of the town will be in their hands, as they will be the Act passes, and of Sydney also upon the completion of the new works, until Parliament shall approve of the transfer of the works to any municipal or other local bodies; subject, however, to the following limitation:—Provided that for the purpose of carrying out and completing the approved schemes of water supply and sewerage, or which executive authority shall have been or be given, the powers, authorities, functions, and obligations respectively conferred and imposed on the said Board by parts II, III, VI, and VII. shall both within and without the boundaries of the said city, be exercisable by and be held to be imposed on the Minister for Works until the said works shall in each case be reported complete to Parliament.

ment as hereinafter provided." That the new works both within and about the city boundaries are to be constructed by the Minister and not by the board. But what is the meaning of the phrase "schemes for which executive authority shall have been or be given?" Mr. HARRINGTON'S bill expressly stipulated for a resolution of both Houses of Parliament recommending some specified scheme; but this has been left out of the new bill. The only authorization required is that of "the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council." There is no provision whatever for Legislative authorization, and the only control Parliament will have is that of the public purse. Once let the money voted under the bill place power in the hands of the Executive to carry out any scheme of water supply or of sewerage distribute. It happens that on the 24th of last June, a loan was authorized of over seven millions sterling, and that sum includes the following items:—“Sydney water supply as estimated of Mr. CLARE, £1,066,768; sewerage—city of Sydney, £400,000.” Sir HENRY BARNES said last week he did not know the passage of this bill would commit the country to any particular scheme.” But it is second and third parts of the bill give full powers of construction both for water and sewerage works all over the county of Newnberland, and clause 57 reads as follows:—“Within thirty-one days after the passing of this Act the Governor shall cause to be prepared a bill to amend the Gazette define the boundaries the metropolitan watershed or drainage area of the streams and other waters, and sources of supply, comprised in the authorised scheme of water supply for the city of Sydney and its suburbs, and also the boundaries of the metropolitan sewerage district within which it is intended to construct the works for the sewerage of the said city and suburbs. And it shall be lawful for the Governor, from time to time, by a like proclamation to define the boundaries of any water or sewerage district for the purpose of supplying with water any one or more boroughs or municipal districts within the County of Cumberland, or for the purposes

British India, where the English population is either official or very scanty, and where the wants of that population reproduce the more luxurious requirements of the well to do portion of the population at home.

The main argument that Mr. BRASSETT builds on the statistics he produces, is to the effect that it is of the highest importance to provide for the safety of the merchant shipping of England to a greater extent than is implied in merely securing what is known as "Colonial defence." In time of war, coal becomes contraband, and every steamship on the high seas belonging to the belligerents becomes excluded from every neutral as well as of course from every belligerent coaling station. Thus, if England is at war, the stations in America, Brazil, in the North Atlantic, at Cape Verd, Madeira, and Lisbon, as well as in China, Japan, and in the unannexed islands in the Pacific, are no longer accessible, either to merchant ships or men-of-war. The Alexandra, the British flagship in the Mediterranean, at her maximum speed, does not carry coal enough for three days. The limit of her range at full speed does not exceed the distance from Plymouth to Lisbon or perhaps Gibraltar. When, at the outbreak of the Zulu war, the early arrival of reinforcements at the Cape was a matter of momentous importance, serious anxiety was expressed about the transports being detained at St.

vincent from want of coal. One prime necessity, then, suggested by the vast colonial commerce of the British Empire is that of having British coaling stations scattered widely about on all the main lines of communication, and securing that they are not only defensible in time of war, but actually defended by the operations of the fleet. Another urgent need is that of dock accommodation for large ironclads away from England. During the last session of Parliament the first Lord of the Admiralty was persistently questioned by Colonel ARBUTHNOT, who elicited the admission that none of the colonies had availed themselves of the Colonial Docks Loan Act of 1895, and that "In point of fact, except at Malta and at Hongkong, and perhaps Australia, we have no dock accommodation for large ironclads away from England." We know well the deficiencies of our own harbour for purposes even less pressing than those here adverted to. The most promising effort that has been made of late to provide for the protection of the mercantile marine is that of endeavouring to make merchant ships a sort of volunteer reserve force to supplement the navy in time of war. Not much has yet been done in this direction, but the Admiralty have issued circulars inviting the owners of ships, satisfying certain conditions as to bulkheads, to register their vessels on a list of reserved cruisers for the navy. It is said that the new Orient steamship has been built so as to be capable of naval service. But Mr. BRASSEY is not sanguine that expedients of this sort will make rapid way unless forced upon the Admiralty by public opinion "Naval officers," he says, "naturally desire to spend all the money voted for the naval services upon ships built especially for war." The position of this colony as a trading community, and the special interest of Sydney in protecting the accessibility of her harbour, as well as in inviting recourse to it, all concur to press home upon our Government the importance of keeping the Imperial Government well awake to the exigencies and perils of what is becoming the largest portion of British commerce.

tween private rights and public law, few people will deny that the suppression of public gambling-house is a legitimate function of Civil government. A man's liberty to do whatever he likes is limited in society by the equal right of everybody else, and from that limit there springs the obligation that no man shall use his individual liberty to the injury of another. The passion for gambling is one of the passions which man can satisfy any human being, whether in dulged publicly or in private. In mercantile transactions the gain is mutual, but in gambling the loss is necessarily all on one side and the loss on the other, so that each is under the strongest temptation to wish harm to the other. A habit which fosters such a passion cannot be a habit which society has a right to suppress. It is far as the State can interfere, although its subjects must suffer deterioration of character.

to the full extent of the evil influences with which they are inevitably brought in contact.

But public gambling is an offence of which it can take cognizance without invading private rights, and must, as the guardian of the public welfare. The Act of 1889 is based on that obligation, and since it is satisfactory to find that the police are awake to the duty of enforcement, there is no reason to doubt the assumption that there is still further need for that vigilance. Nor should the matter be left entirely to the police. All good citizens should recognize the detection and suppression of gambling-houses as a public duty. They send young men from homes of industry, and tempt them to fraud, vagrancy, and embezzlement. They place them in the hands of unscrupulous gamblers, who, under the guise of innocent amusement, and often rob them of their character, their social standing, and all prospect of future usefulness and prosperity. They are usually associated with a host of other vicious agencies that prey alike upon society and their rotaries. Some voices admit of generosity, gentility, and even, fits of self-denial; but the passion for gambling curdles all the kindly emotions of humanity, and has not one association to make it amiable. The law of the land properly enforced to the full extent that private rights are limited by the public good.

Juries sometimes agree upon strange verdicts, but we do not remember to have lately met with a more eccentric finding than the one which was arrived at in the Southern district a few days ago. It appears that at the Bull mine, one of the miners was accidentally killed by a fall of coal. Such was the fact first brought out in evidence at the coroner's inquest. The jury, however, whose business it is to determine upon the facts of the case, agreed that instead of being killed by a fall of coal, the unfortunate man met his death from the effects of foul air. The matter is thus stated by the Following Ayres:—"The deceased man's mate explained very clearly and intelligently the manner in which the accident had occurred, showing that no man could have been so careless as to have been in that position, could have been so careless as to have been in that position, could have been so careless as to have been in that position. Every detail connected with the internal management of the mine appeared to be perfect. The deceased man and his mate were careful and experienced miners, neither of whom anticipated any danger. Notwithstanding all this, a sudden outburst of hot steam, causing severe injuries to the head and extremities of the deceased, the evidence proved that the deceased had his skull fractured, his thigh broken and dislocated, and his body crushed. The medical man unhesitatingly gave it as his opinion that death ensued from these injuries combined, and the great shock to the nervous system, arising therefrom. In spite of such clear and conclusive testimony the jury gave a verdict that deceased met his death from the effects of foul air." Presuming that the facts are as our contemporary has stated

HEADQUARTERS CAMP, VICTORIA BARRACKS, FRIDAY.

In accordance with the regulations the continuous training of the infantry and engineer portions of the Defence Force of the colony commenced this (Friday) morning, at 8 o'clock, at the Victoria Barracks, Paddington. The weather was very stormy, and rain fell in heavy showers. Notwithstanding this, however, there were a few of the men were absent when the bugles sounded the assembly.

The men of the 1st and 2nd Regiments and the Engineers, assembled at their respective parades, at an early hour, and after being inspected, were marched off to the camp, and told to take the respective tools of their trade. In some cases, in some cases, yet the men appeared to go on with the several duties assigned to them with a willingness and cheerfulness that promised well for their conduct during the encampment. The 3rd or Southern and Western Regiment arrived by train about 9 o'clock at the Redfern Railway Station, and from there marched to the camp, headed by the headquarters band, which had gone to meet them. Although the men were wet, they presented a remarkably fine appearance, physically, and their marching was very steady. Fortunately for them, their tents are located in the driest and best portion of the ground, and as everything and been arranged in accordance with the weather, the men indeed had been the case for the rest of the force, they were soon comfortably ensconced therein. The only work done during the morning was preparing the kitchens, clearing the trenches, and making things generally as comfortable as they could under the circumstances.

The position of the camp, however, was not stated in today's Herald, and there is, therefore, no occasion to repeat them. It may be stated, however that No. 2 have decidedly the worst of sites. It is almost flat, and as the drainage here is not quite what it might be, there is some danger of damp and discomfort, to some extent, to the men.

The property of holding the encampment in the grounds inclosed by the barracks is such that it can scarcely be questioned by any one who has knowledge of the evolutions and tactics which are necessary for the training of troops imperatively necessary for all large bodies of infantry to become thoroughly acquainted with. In selecting the site the Commandant had in view, not the enjoyment of the men in gazing on magnificent scenery, but the opportunity of the men in the carrying out, to the fullest extent, of the regulations which provide for "six days' continuous training." The barrack grounds are adapted for the purpose in every respect; and even if they are small, they are adapted for the purpose of the operations, such as sham fights, etc., the Commandant has in close proximity on the right and left of the Randwick Road, the Rifle Range and Moore Park, in either of which any movement could be executed with the greatest ease.

The response made by the men to the order for continuous training was as follows:

tinuous training, must cause some surprise and not a little gratification to all who have watched with interest the attempt to improve our volunteer system by the adoption of the regulations now in force. There can be but little doubt that not half the number would have been present under the old regulations. Had some of the men who were excused now actually remained to be proved that the encampments, such as the one now being held, will have the beneficial effect they are confidently expected to produce. True, there has been already one encampment since the present regulations were promulgated; but the number of men who assembled on that occasion, was so small, and their acquaintance with the details of their duties so limited, that the results of that gathering could not be taken as an evidence of what might be expected when there was a larger and better drilled body of men brought together, as in the present instance.

Towards the afternoon, the rain held off, and the sun shone out brightly. The effect on the camp seemed magical, as in a very short time large numbers of men began to appear. The ground, however, was still "prisoned" under the different tents and taking stock of anything that was thought worth looking at. The bright red coats of the men looked quite gorgeous in the afternoon sun, and the constant communication kept up all over the ground rendered the scene quite an animated one. Suddenly there was a change in the aspect of affairs. At 3.15 the buglers sounded "dress for parade," and at half-past 3 the regiments fell in for drill. After a few evolutions in battalion, each company was put through a series of movements in company drill by the Staff instructor, until 4.55 p.m., when the rain again fell heavily, and the regiments were dismissed. The companies seemed to vie with each other as to which would be the best; but we must certainly give the preference to the

—The culinary arrangements seemed to give universal satisfaction, and not a complaint was recorded either on that score or as to the quality and quantity of the food provided. Indeed the beef was of more than average quality. The camp kitchens were prepared by

About ten minutes to 7, the Northern Battalion, composed of the Maitland and Newcastle Companies, 159 strong, marched into camp. They came per City of Brisbane, and reported the passage as a fine one.

The only casualty during the day occurred to assistant-surgeon M'Donagh, who, we regret to say, was thrown from his charger while proceeding to the camp. Fortunately the gallant officer sustained no

Dr. Dansey was the principal medical officer during the day, and his duties were, we are happy to say, of a very light description. The officer of the day was Major Phillips; Adjutant of the day, Captain James Wilson. Captain J. M. Smith, of the 1st Regiment, was in charge of the brigade main guard. The only prisoner confined during the day was one man for coming into camp in a drunken state.

ARTILLERY CAMP, MIDDLE HEAD, FRIDAY.

After the despatch of yesterday's letter, the weather improved to this extent only—the rain subsided and the wind began to blow, not exactly what is commonly termed "great guns," but in sufficient force to make an overcast desirable; the latter, however, was not deemed so much for the sake of warmth as for protecperfectly fresh and good, and might, in the opinion of those on board, have remained exposed without deterioration for a much longer time.

Having on our own responsibility declared the success of their undertaking, the M'Livraith and his associates, of course might be regarded as biased, resolved to give a luncheon, at which both interested and uninterested persons might judge for themselves. Accordingly, after issuing some scores of invitations they had a luncheon served on board the Strathleven on Friday last, February 6. Something like 100 persons were present, including Sir Thomas M'Livraith (the Queensland Premier), Sir Charles Whetham (ex-Lord Mayor of London), Colonel Du Plat Taylor, Mr. Forster (late Agent-General for New South Wales), Sir Robert Torrens, Mr. Branson, Mr. W. M'Arthur, M.P., and a large number of the leading Australian colonists now in London, and the general impression was in favour of the colonies, especially the import trade. Before proceeding to the business of the occasion the party were admitted in batches to an inspection of the machinery and of the meat as it lay in the freezing chamber. They then assembled in the saloon of the steamer, where they were served with a substantial meal, consisting of roast mutton, corned beef, roast mutton, roast mutton, roast mutton, roast mutton, roast mutton, corned beef, and boiled beef—all, of course, taken from the frozen store. The repast was heartily enjoyed by all present, and the one unhesitating verdict was that the meat they had tasted was delicious, fresh, succulent, rich in flavour, and in every respect all that could be desired or could be expected to come from such a source. There were of course toasts and speeches, and the festivity was prolonged for some time as became an event of so much interest, satisfaction, and importance. Mr. Andrew M'Livraith presided. The orthodox loyal toasts were drunk in bumpers of champagne, and then Sir R. Torrens having proposed "The Australian Colonies," Mr. M'Livraith, who had been previously claimed by the young colony he represented, made a large share of interest in this experiment, as that manifested by any other Australian colony. He spoke with a tone of certainty of the success which would attend a trade based upon the results of this trial voyage, pointing out the immense advantage England would derive from £28 to £30 here, could be purchased in Sydney for £5. Turning to the question of free trade, as raised in some degree by the matter under consideration, he proclaimed himself to some extent a protectionist, qualifying this statement, however, by adding that he was not an advocate of such rabid protection as would prevent the import of goods that did not approve of intercolonial free trade, for that was simply protectionism of another kind. What Queensland desired was a thoroughly successful commerce between England and her colonies; but, in his view, the Government should assist enterprises which at first were unable to advance themselves. In respect to the meat trade, and the meat could be bought in the former country for three half-pence and twopence a pound, and could be brought to England at a cost of, say, another twopence a pound, the trade, if once established, must prove successful and remunerative, and highly beneficial to both England and Australia.

Mr. Forster, proposing "The Health of our Hosts," congratulated the chartering firm on the result of their venture, and, referring to the previous speaker's observations, declared himself in favour of absolute free trade throughout the universe. He also condemned the course adopted by Victoria, and expressed an apprehension that further protection would ensue, if the land revenue was not increased.

In acknowledging the cordiality with which the company had received this toast, Mr. Andrew M'Livraith said he was convinced that a highly remunerative meat trade could be now carried on with Australia, there being three or four lines of steamers which could use the freezing chamber on the outward voyage, and the cargo could be carried in the hold of the steamer's luggage, as had been done on the Strathleven, or for meat for consumption during the voyage. He hoped each a trade would be established, and conducted on a large scale.

The health of Mr. James Campbell having been given, was drunk with warm enthusiasm. That gentleman briefly acknowledged the compliment, and then, having returned to his seat, he turned to the subject in his proper order so far, I will deal with a branch of the subject second only in importance to the refrigerating process, viz., the sale of the consignment. The feasibility of preserving the meat being established, the next question was, how could it be sold? It was required to test the chances of a paying trade. Accordingly, on the following day—Saturday last—five carcasses of beef and 200 of mutton were taken from the ship and conveyed to Smithfield Market. Sixty sheep had been disposed of on the preceding night at 6d. a pound, and on Saturday the remainder of the first lot was sold at 5d. a pound. The result, as I have already noted, however, that the weather on that day was warmer than it had been during the week, and this had produced a downward tendency in the transactions all round. The higher price named was fetched by the carcasses wrapped in canvas, and probably if all meat had been equally protected, the result would have been different. It is a matter of some dirt being upon the surface—and this of course frozen on—sold against it. The meat, however, showed no discoloration whatever, as the American carcasses generally do, and the butchers not only pronounced decidedly in favour of the Australian meat as against American, but some of them declared it was equal to the best they had ever seen. Some of the carcasses of mutton weighed from 56 lbs. to 60 lbs., while a few even reached 70 lbs. and 80 lbs. These weights just suited the butchers, but the mode of cutting and preparing was in some slight respects not quite approved of, and the wisdom of covering all meat so improved was strongly urged.

The carcasses of beef were sold at 5d. a pound, but they were found rather larger than the London market required. Nevertheless, it fetched 5d. a pound, and this was 5d. higher than what had been paid for American beef during the week. The beef was in point of fact not only the heaviest, but too good. It was indeed so good that the dealers who had bought it, and who were not able to get rid of it, had to sell it at a loss.
